DR. WILLIAM E. BUTLER, whose death at Jackson on Friday last was published in the APPEAL of Saturday, was a distinguished citizen as far back as the days of Jacksons on whose staff he served during the war of 1812, being tresent at New Orleans, the anniversary of which brilliant victory was celebrated on Sunday. Dr. Butler married a niece of General Jackson's wife, and settled in Madison county in 1821. There he pur chased a large body of land and laid out the town of Jackson, which he named after Tennessee's great hero. He also owned a great many lots in Memphis. In this way he became very wealthy, and therefore altogether co-utterly too too-aristocratic for his eighbors, who, on being reminded by Davy Crockett of the fact that he had carpets on the floors of his double log cabin, refused to send him to congress. They preferred the great hunter, trapper and Indian fighter. The Jackson correspondent of the American says that Dr. Butler was an elegant and scholarly gentleman, and in the early days of Jackson no man dispensed a more liberal hospitality than he did, and he was identified with all the public enterprises in Jackson since the building of the first cabin.
